Hello,

I'm applying for the Product Manager role at Helfy.

Before growth and funnels, I spent two years as one of two product owners at Renaissance Life, taking two regulated insurance products from concept to launch. One was the first offer in the Russian market for people living with HIV. The regulatory approval was the straightforward part — what took the work was how to talk about a stigmatised diagnosis without making people feel examined, what the form may ask and in what order, and where someone abandons because the product made them feel like a risk instead of a patient. Both went into the company's core line-up and were distributed through banks as part of mortgage approval.

DoktorABC reads familiar to me for that reason: prescriptions, sensitive conditions, and a regulated flow that exists because people would rather not walk into a clinic for it.

Since then I've been doing the other half of the job. For four years I've owned B2C acquisition funnels end-to-end at TripleTen — specs, build, test, read the data, next version. Ten depth interviews pairing the live ad creative with the landing page showed our value proposition sitting below the fold, and rebuilding around decision clarity lifted conversion to qualified lead by 18.5% ($p < 0.01$). Seven A/B tests took quiz start rate from 41% to 48% with no loss in lead quality. A pre-scoring formula I built with our analysts added 14% more qualified leads and freed about eight hours of sales time a week. We sustain 2–5 tests a month across five funnels, which works because I also built the agent pipeline that ships the pages.

My background is in mass communication and psychology, and I build health tools on my own time — ruah-tools.ai.studio is a set of tools for anxiety I built solo. Digital health isn't a market I'm moving into, it's what I already read about on weekends.

CV attached.
