ALEXANDRA MIRON

Product Manager · B2C Acquisition Funnels & Experimentation

Be'er Sheva, Israel • +972 55-269-1864 • miron.alexandrra@gmail.com • linkedin.com/in/alexandramiron8 • portfolio-alexmir8.vercel.app

---

Hello,

I'm applying for the Product Manager role at Helfy.

The thing that made me want to apply is older than my current job. At Renaissance Life I was one of two product owners launching the first insurance offer in the Russian market for people living with HIV. Getting the regulator to approve it took months, but what I remember is how much we argued about wording. Every question on the form had to be asked in a way that didn't make the person feel inspected, and we kept finding places where people dropped out not because the product was wrong for them but because it had treated them like a risk file. Both products we launched ended up in the company's main line-up and were sold through banks alongside mortgages.

So when I read what DoktorABC does — prescriptions, conditions people don't want to discuss across a counter, a flow built so they don't have to — I know what kind of problem that is.

The rest of what I do is what you list in the ad. For four years I've owned B2C acquisition funnels at TripleTen. I write the specs, run the tests and read the numbers myself. We sat ten people down with our live ad and our landing page side by side and watched them miss the value proposition entirely, because it sat below the fold; rebuilding the page around that took conversion to qualified lead up 18.5% ($p < 0.01$). Seven tests on the quiz entry screen moved start rate from 41% to 48% without losing lead quality. A pre-scoring formula I built with our analysts brought in 14% more qualified leads and gave the sales team back about eight hours a week. We get through two to five tests a month across five funnels, which is only possible because I built the agent pipeline that ships the pages.

I studied mass communication and psychology, and I still build health things in my own time. ruah-tools.ai.studio is a set of tools for anxiety I made on my own. I'd be reading about this industry whether or not I was applying to it.

CV attached.

Alexandra Miron